Letter from our Pastor

An Extraordinary Parish for Ordinary People

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

It might seem a little strange, but for most of Christian history, people didn't think much about the history of the liturgy. Where did what we are doing at Mass come from anyway was not a question that many people asked. The organic development of the liturgy from the primitive period to the Age of the Fathers to the medieval world happened without a lot of thought about why. Pilgrims from all over Europe went to Rome and brought back home with them texts from the papal court, and the idea, "If it's good enough for the Pope, it's good enough for us," meant Roman usages coexisted with a panoply of other local customs. As the Middle Ages waned, the idea caught on that earlier meant simpler, and that we needed to somehow recover the spirit of the ancient Church to be authentically Christian. The corollary to that idea was that worship got more complex over time, and risked overlaying the simplicity of the Gospel with accretions and unnecessary rituals. The Protestant Reformation in many ways took that uncritical assumption for granted. And even in the Catholic Church, the Council of Trent sought to recover the truths of the ancient Church.

It wasn't until the eighteenth century that serious historical scholarship began about the liturgy, and it happened to take that assumption for granted as well. The patristic revival in Anglicanism brought the Fathers back in vogue. Prosper Guéranger, Adrian Fortescue and Ildefons Schuster wrote significant works of scholarship that seriously influenced discussions over the forms that the liturgy should take. By the time Vatican II came around, Josef Jungmann's epic 1951 work Missarum sollemnia became the gold standard for liturgical history. To this day, most priests and seminarians are formed by that thinking, and the assumption that simple became complex, and complex is bad. Decisions were taken at Vatican II and afterwards that reflected all of that intellectual milieu.

A few scholars like Klaus Gamber and Alcuin Reid have suggested that Jungmann may not have been entirely correct, and their conclusions have regrettably been ignored. In the meantime, a whole host of commentators who are not trained liturgical historians have attempted to poke holes in Jungmann's work, and many younger lay and clerical types have bought into their narratives as well. But even they often buy into this one assumption. At the same time, linguistics, sociology and literary analysis are demonstrating that, if anything, in many ways we are going from more complex to simpler, and that recovering a sense of "how things were" doesn't mean assuming primitive equals less sophisticated. Pope Pius XII in his encyclical Mediator Dei had already warned us in 1947 about assuming ancient means better and that subsequent development means falsification, but his prophetic voice was ignored. Yet even he too succumbed to the same thinking by simplifying the rites of Holy Week on these same lines a few years before he cautioned against. And the Mass has been tinkered with over and over again since, in a frenetic attempt to "get it right."

Challenging the questionable assumption that has guided almost a century of liturgy reform is not a recipe for popularity nowadays in the theological establishment. But the quest for truth urges us on. Father Michael Lang from the London Oratory has just published a massive work of scholarship this year that will replace Jungmann's stranglehold on liturgical thinking. The Roman Mass: From Early Christian Origins to the Tridentine Reform is a monumental rethink in the light of recent scholarship of the development of the liturgy until 1570, when Pope St Pius V extended the use of the missal used in the papal court to the whole Latin Church. My hope is that a more objective analysis of the sacred liturgy in our time will seek here the principles to move forward to authentic reform and restoration. Even if you're not a liturgy nerd like me, you will profit from this dense but good read!

In Christ,

Fr. Christopher Smith
