From Our Pastor

Dear Parishioners,

The Catholic Church has always been extraordinarily reserved about exorcisms, not because she does not believe evil exists, but precisely because the Church has spent 2000 years battling Satan and has learned a thing or two in that time about what is effective and what is not. Prurient curiosity about the preternatural is never a sign of a healthy spiritual life. One of the weirder phenomena of the contemporary world is the emergence of a culture of celebrity exorcists. What was once rarely talked about in the open is now a topic for podcasts and YouTube videos. Some of these self-proclaimed experts in demonology are now openly in conflict with the hierarchy of the Church, which is precisely one of the signs of the activity of the Evil One. Diabolos in Greek means: to throw across, to cast through, and is often used to refer to the act of slandering someone, throwing an accusation across their reputation. The outcome of the Accuser is division. And today, the Accuser is dividing Catholics in the name of healing from Evil, which is absolutely insidious.

When someone contacts a priest about an exorcism, there is a whole series of questions that he asks. Are you baptized? Are you in full communion with the Catholic Church? Have you gone to confession? Do you read the Bible and pray every day? Are you living a virtuous life? Have you abandoned occult practices? Have you had a full physical and psychological examination and are doing what is needed for your health, and are your medications in order and working properly? Most of the time, people answer no to one or more or all of these questions, and they go away sad and angry when they are told they must take care of these things first. They are looking for magic, not Jesus.

Give the Devil his due, but don't blame him because you chose to do something stupid and now face the consequences of your own actions. You're not possessed or obsessed, you just need Jesus. Stop trying to blame someone else for your problems. The Scriptures remind us that we are fighting against the world, the flesh and the devil. While the three are related, they are not the same, and they are mentioned as different in order for a reason. If you don't abandon worldliness and you don't get your flesh under control by virtue, penance and mortification, all of the exorcisms in the world are not going to free you from what you don't want to be freed from.

Authority is important. A priest over his parish, a parent over his children, has a spiritual duty to pray for those in his or her care to be liberated from the world, the flesh and the devil. There are prayers for deliverance and healing which you can pray as well when you have your own spiritual house in order. The use of sacramentals is encouraged as part of that battle. Minor exorcisms are done once all of that has been done. And even then, with great reserve. Major exorcisms are always under the authority of the Bishop, and the Office for Spiritual Supplications for the Diocese spends most of its time asking the real questions that need to be answered first before any path of discernment opens towards major exorcisms.

AI or the internet and social media are not the place to learn about how to fight the Evil One. The foot of the Cross is where you learn that, and Jesus is the guide. The supernatural life of grace comes first, always.

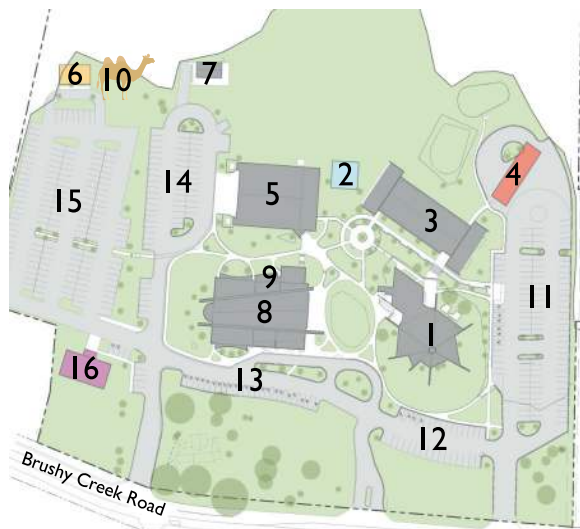

Sincerely in Christ,

Canon Christopher Smith

On the Cover: Fr Christopher Smith led Catholic educators from across the Upstate in professional development and Catholic formation, presenting on the Four Marks of a Catholic School and divine worship as the source and summit of Catholic education. Principal Nathan Barontini joined fellow educators for the day, which included Mass, fellowship and collaboration.
