From Our Pastor

Dear Parishioners,

Last month Jean-Paul Cardinal Vesco, the Archbishop of Algiers, stated that the Catholic Church was "not a Church that was there to convert . . . what matters to me is not that a Muslim becomes a Christian, but that a person has a spiritual experience." American Bishop Robert Barron responded on X, "If I really thought that the Church does not exist to bring people to Christ, then I would resign and get an honest job." Apparently Bishop Barron was reading a quotation from Vesco that was summarized in another blog. In reality, Vesco prefaced his quote with talking about the unique Algerian context where Christian proselytism is illegal, so the work of evangelization in that context is a matter of building up good relations and fraternity among the people they are called to serve. That served to make some people think that Vesco's quotation was not all that bad, but the cardinal then responded publicly to Bishop Barron: "I believe that the believers of the three monotheistic religions have better things to do than to seek to convert one another."

Algeria and the United States are very different missionary contexts. The Church wisely learns the long game in places where hostility to Christianity is deeply rooted. But that long game often frustrates those whose vision of evangelization is more attuned to the way evangelicals proselytize than how Catholics traditionally have inculturated themselves over time. Vesco's perspective seems to be at variance with the Great Commission, and Barron picks up on that.

Father Luigi Giussani was a Catholic university chaplain in Milan in the last century. A Jewish girl came to him to tell him she wanted to be baptized as a Catholic. He told her that she needed to explore her birth faith first, and that, if it did not answer her questions, then she should explore the religion of her new Catholic friends. At first glance, it seems like Giussani was anticipating Vesco. But he explained why: religious experience begins with God's initiative, not our own.

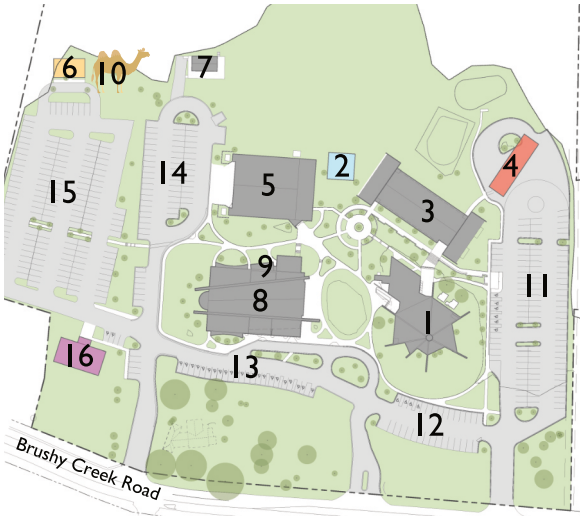

A person converting to Catholicism is not a point for Team Catholic to get a win on the other side. It is important for the person to ask themselves why they are converting, and whether there are clear signs of divine providence leading them to the faith rather than just wanting to embrace a certain aesthetic or culture or trend. What happens when the emotions fade and the honeymoon ends?

We need to accompany those interested in the faith to develop their conscience and truly understand what it is to live an authentically Catholic life. "Superficial attempts at evangelization don't provide a convert the tools they need to enter into a deep, flourishing relationship with God," blogger Stephen Adubato recently wrote. The process of conversion to Catholicism takes time. In Islamic countries, the minimal time for the OCIA process is usually three years. Why? Because the Catholic Church in those countries has seen a high recidivism rate in those whose formation is shortened or made easier. In our own country, recent studies have shown a similar process of reversion away from the faith after a superficial process of conversion. It's exciting to see so many embracing the faith, but we have to give them tools to continue to embrace it long after the Easter Vigil is over. Let's work for conversions, but God brings about the conversion of heart when we do our part to proclaim the Gospel and accompany people in their journey, which is rarely a simple, straightforward path.

Canon Christopher Smith

On the Cover: Throughout November, the St Joseph Altar honors the faithful departed with candles remembering parishioners who died during the past year. White roses commemorate children lost to miscarriage, while a single red rose remembers children lost to abortion. Please pray for all the faithful departed.
